Twitter is moving target and Wall Street likes the new numbers it sees up on the scoreboard. The company's monthly active user base grew 24 percent from the year-ago period to 271 million, but Twitter's real reach goes well beyond that, the social media company claims. hundreds of millions of additional unique visitors who come to Twitter every month but log in. When you consider combining monthly active users and unique visitors, the size of our audience in our owned and operated properties is two to three times our monthly active user base, which we believe ranks us among the 10 largest digitally connected audiences in the world. CEO Dick Costolo tells analysts after releasing his latest earnings. Making this opportunity a fact has caused massive turnover among the late executive ranks, as Costolo retools the company for its next phase of growth. The company's CEO, chief financial officer, product chairman and head of media partnerships have all left or relinquished within months. The ad team avoided the DoorTwitter Battalion advertising team, however, remains more intact with Adam Bain, head of global revenue and partnerships, leading the charge. Revenue grew 124 percent over the year to $312 million, and advertising revenue per 1,000 timeline views doubled to $1.60 per 1,000 views over the same period. Although net loss broadened from $42.2 million in the year-ago period to $144.6 million, analysts and investors appeared to be seeing more light at the end of the tunnel. Company shares roared, jumping as high as 32 percent immediately after the social network reported its latest earnings, and the week ended with a market cap it has not seen since late April. Despite all the activity and optimism new to Twitter's future, stock prices still hover around the same rate as it did at the time of its initial public offering in November 2013 steering wheel. [Related: 14 Must See Social Media Marketing Success Story] While Facebook blocked through 15 months of operations before it was again worth it at the time of its IPO in May 2012, Twitter has withered back the value of its IPO levels in almost half that amount of time (8 months). There is no doubt that Twitter is gaining traction, but the pace of growth has remained steady for the past few quarters. The World Cup marked another watershed moment for the podium, but CEEs carefully avoid the temptation to raise expectations based on a world event of such magnitude that only comes every four years. [Related: How social media is increasing the World Cup experience] With the exception of the Curated World Cup experience Twitter started during the month-long competition, the company's timeline views jump 15 percent year-over-year to 173 billion. It also helped a strong driver in the quarter with 81 percent of total ad revenue generated from mobile devices, marking a 67 percent increase from a year earlier, says Mike Gupta, who is leaving himself CFO to become the company's senior vice president of strategic investments. In some ways Twitter's wealth is improving in line with the company's ability to build more of the less. Ad revenue grew 129 percent year-over-year, despite a 35 percent reduction in spending per ad nomination. Twitter makes no money from exclusive visitors who don't log in to the site or tweets embedded elsewhere, but the company is starting to experiment with that audience in an effort to change that. Costolo says the company won't make that off-grid audience today, but it's likely to be in the long run using the same types of advertising units to be offered on Twitter today. The growing reach and audience are all good and good, but as long as Twitter can't make money from syndicated content, mentions and its overall popularity on other media, its financial gains and prospects will be limited. Boosting Twitter's reach into Mass Media is the good news for Twitter and its investors that the path to wealth in off-grid media is already well defined. Incoming CFO Amarnath Neto says the company's tv ad targeting means that enabling revenue streams like TV ads and content creation to expand their reach beyond organic following and increasing the size of their audiences. Related: Mobile advertising with native social networks Twitter is a perfect example of how we can do that and create a larger audience for content producer and Facebook drives more advertising down. The leverage of relationships with celebrities and institutions in the music and entertainment has been Twitter's approach for years. Rarely is a prime-time show or big sporting event off without monitoring Twitter or likely detailed plans, surprise fans with highlights or promotions in real time. In addition, the user base that's just a fifth the size of Facebook. Twitter often remains the most popular and rising to the top of popular culture. The National Basketball Association recently announced that its official category (@NBA) per ball will be the official game for next season. This level of mass media production just as often doesn't happen to Facebook these days. I think Twitter is unique where most technology companies disrupt other industries and disrupt other businesses, but Twitter actually makes other companies and other brands better than it would otherwise. Neto, a former securities analyst who used to be the National Football League's CFO, says. I think it's the unique complementary nature of our information network that really partners us with a lot of types of companies, which increases the amount of information we have and content that aggregates a larger audience and just continues that virtual cycle. [Related: Twitter Readies design changes as it unveils new ad offerings] When big news breaks around the world, Twitter TV and news partners are driving people's attention to the platform as they seek content about what's happening and unfold in real time. Many of them browse around, come search, come look at profiles. And obviously, from the numbers we see, most of them decide not to sign in. In a shopping tweet coming soon? Plenty of opportunities, but sell driving directly on the platform could well become the holy grail for Twitter. Recent acquisitions of Cardspring and TapCommerce have emperors Twitter's plans for business as it continues to experiment in the fledgling social shopping space. High running expectations with Nathan Hubbard, the former CEO of Ticketmaster, leading the trade charge on Twitter. The company has been running experiments with Amazon since May that enable users to add products to their shopping carts via a tweet. Meanwhile some users have viewed a purchase button already embedded on tweets promoted on Twitter's mobile app. Costolo declined to provide further details about Twitter's plans to buy in a tweet, but any indication suggests a significant change and new revenue stream may come sooner than later. While this is annoying for American sports fans living outside the USA, it's standard practice for TV channels to be confined to their region for copyright reasons. Without changing the area on your phone (which can deal with your other apps), there's a lot of work you can do. Is there a better alternative? Yes, there is (if you prefer not to pay). ASPN, Athletic, Scurr, Fox Sports and Yahoo Sports are some of the biggest names from a long list of rival American sports programs. The big drawback to many of these programs (including CBS Sport) is that you need to pay to watch live video streams. There are brewing rumors that ESPN is planning to charge a subscription fee. It's totally free at the moment. ASPN also has the advantage of providing video streaming services in countries outside the USA, while CBS even restricts some live videos to specific areas within the USA. In time, ASPN is a better option. THE CBS SPORTS APP OFFERS A GREAT SERVICE. there and there are some bugs . The score may not change in the program though updates and commentary say otherwise, for example. Nothing worth worrying about and nothing that can't be easily updated on the next Make the fixed.
